On the 14th of this month we went to the 19th Streatham Kite Festival on Streatham Common in South London. We saw it for the first time last year, and we were really looking forward to this year's event. It has a very happy and excited atmosphere of anticipation, with everyone there just to enjoy the displays and fly their own kites. We were very glad that the day started bright and breezy, after some overnight and early morning showers. Sun and warmth are both optional, but the breezes are essential and the weather gave us all these at once. The Common is ideal for kite flying as the back of it slopes gently upwards and I think this must increase the wind that blows in from the downhill direction, and away from the main road at the base. There are large mature trees dotted around the edges and it is up to the flyers to avoid getting their cords too near to these, if they don't wish to lose their kites in the branches.

This scene looked like a good story or film in the making, a huge protective Superman figure hovering over the people, ready to fly off and attack anything that was threatening to harm or hurt us, or cause trouble. He had a good view of everything, and his hands and fingers were waving around, as if impatient to get to grips with a problem and solve it as efficiently and peacefully as he knows how. I am very glad to say that nothing untoward happened, which is just how Superman and the rest of us like it, a congenial and enjoyable day out for hundreds of families and children.
